Program Notes

Johann Christian Bach

b. 5 Sept 1735 Leipzig

d. 1 Jan 1782 London

Quartet in B-flat Major

Johann Christian Bach, the youngest member of the Bach family, was the only one to break completely away from the traditional calling as a protestant church and chamber musician. His studies under the Padre Martini paved the way for operatic successes at Turin, Florence and, Naples—success that was directly responsible for his appointment in 1762 for a season as official composer at the King's Theater, London and as Music Master to George III's Queen for the remainder of his life.

The Quartet in B-flat for oboe and string trio, like the quartets for flute and string trio, has only two movements. Since the Allegro's development is almost entirely derived from the movement's main theme, it is absent in the recapitulation. Melodiousness, grace and poise characterize the work as a whole. One of the most beautiful moments is the viola's splendidly expressive G minor episode in the Rondo.

EJ Moeran (Ernest John)

b. 31 December 1894~ Heston

d. 1 December 1950~ near Kenmare, Ireland

Fantasy Quartet

While Moeran occupied a minor place in the music of his time, his meticulously polished and ready technique is unsurpassed among his British contemporaries. The son of a Norfolk clergyman, he was educated at Uppingham School, where he learned to play the violin. In 1913, he entered the RCM, but after 18 months his studies were interrupted by World War I. Commissioned as a dispatch rider, Moeran suffered a serious head injury and was declared unfit for further active service. With demobilization in 1919, he returned to his old school as music master, but soon decided to continue his studies and began work under John Ireland until 1923.

It was after this period with Ireland that Moeran's music began to receive public performances. At this time, his music was dominated by the influences of Ireland and of Delius, whose chromatic harmony would always to colour Moeran's work. Intimacy with the folksongs of his native East Anglia also strongly affected his melodic style.

Such influences are evidenced in the Fantasy Quartet. Dedicated to the oboist Leon Goossens, the quartet was first performed with the Cart String Trio at a post war New London Concerts on 8 December 1946 at the Cambridge Theatre in London. Written in Rockland St. Mary, Norfolk, the one movement Fantasy reflects the composer's boyhood delight in the countryside. Some have even traced snippets of two Norfolk folk tunes — Seventeen Come Sunday, and The Pretty Ploughboy—within the work. The tunes themselves, however, are never heard in full.

Jean Françaix

b. 23 May 1912~ Le Mans

d. 25 Sept 1997~ Paris

Composer and pianist Jean Françaix was first influenced by his father who served as the director of the Le Mans Conservatoire. In the early 1920's, Françaix began study with Nadia Boulanger, who later played and conducted several premier performances of his works in the salon of the Princesse de Polignac.

As a composer, Françaix was prolific in all genres, producing rich and diverse body of work that comprised more than 200 pieces. He enjoyed many early successes, including the 1932 performance of his Eight Bagatelles for piano and string quartet at the International Society for Contemporary Music Festival in Vienna. Described by Heinrich Strobel as "fresh water, rushing from a spring with the gracious spontaneity of all that is natural," Françaix's Concertino for piano was also received with enthusiasm at the Baden-Baden Chamber Music Festival in 1936.

Exploiting the resources of traditional instruments, Françaix cultivated a personal aesthetic that drew on the sources of the past and on the colours of French music, in the manner of Ravel. Regarding atonality as an impasse, he took pride in claiming a position among neo-classical composers. Françaix was recognized throughout his life for his work, winning the Florence Gould prize in 1950 and the Grand Prix Arthur Honegger in 1992.

Benjamin Britten

b. 22 November 1913~ Lowestoft

d. 4 December 1976 Aldeburgh

Phantasy, Quartet for oboe and strings, op. 2

The time-span of the small, but not insignificant body of chamber music that Britten wrote for solo oboe extends from the days of his first London successes as a student composer at the Royal College of Music in the early thirties, until 1951, when he became recognized by the public as a genius of first rank.

Dating from 1932, the Phantasy Quartet for oboe and string trio, is, despite its youthfulness of expression, perhaps one of the most important pieces. The work marked Britten's first international success when it was performed at the International Society of Contemporary Music in Florence, establishing him abroad as one of the leading young English composers of his day. An important part of the established chamber music repertoire, the work reflects the characteristics of the youthful Britten's music—dazzling technique, formal originalities and zestful exploration of a chosen solo instrument, and of what, technically might be persuaded from it.

The work, an ambitious structural fusion, is constructed in arch form and its intricate structure suggests that the brilliant young composer had already absorbed the idea of the sonata-cycle compression contained in Schoenberg's First Chamber Symphony. Stealthily emerging from and returning to the silence in which it began, the work is framed by a march introduction and postlude. In this introduction, the oboe enters for the first time, molto pianissimo, with the main theme. At the climax of the development, an unexpected slow pastoral section intervenes with a lengthy elaboration of a new theme for strings before the oboe rejoins, leading the music back to the recapitulation and the march postlude.

Bohuslav Martinu

b. 8 December 1890~ Bohemia

d. 28 August 1959, Liestal, Switzerland

Although he spent most of his creative life away from his native Czechoslovakia, Martinu is widely regarded, after Janáček, as the most substantial Czech composer of the 20th century. A very prolific composer, Martinu possessed a facility that allowed him to write in virtually every instrumental and vocal genre.

A broad group of composers influenced his work including Suk, Roussel, Janáček, Debussy, and Stravinsky. Martinu was also profoundly receptive to earlier styles as inspiration and as a means of extending his work, including Bach, Corelli, and Vivaldi. This montage of influences fuelled inspiration rather than prompting a pastiche. The description of Martinu as an eclectic is misleading—by the late 1920's, he had developed a personal voice and for the rest of his career his style remained one of the most distinctive of the mid-20th century.

Mazurka-Nocturne, Op. Posthumous, 1949(notes not available)

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart

b. 27 January 1756~ Salzburg

d. 5 December 1791~ Vienna

Quartet in F Major, K 370

The Oboe Quartet in F major was composed expressly for the brilliant Mannheim and Munich oboist Friedrich Ramm. Early in 1781, Ramm and Mozart were both in Munich where Mozart was supervising the first production of his opera Idomeneo. Just as he was accustomed to tailoring his operatic arias to suit the vocal characteristics of his leading singers, so here he modeled his quartet with the special virtues of Ramm's artistry in mind—delicacy, lightness and power of expression are all reflected in the quartet.

The work holds an important position in the composer's chamber music for many reasons, among them its concertante treatment of the oboe. The opening Allegro presents a sparkling dialogue between the violin and the oboe. Here, the opening theme also acts as the second subject in the dominant key as the oboe superimposes an elegant countermelody. A new motive is introduced in development that based on the interval of a fourth and shows contrapuntal leanings.

The Adagio in D minor marks one of the most beautiful tunes ever entrusted to the oboe, as it weaves an expressive, rhapsodic commentary while the strings provide harmonic support to the melody. The concluding Rondeau, which dances over the complete range of the oboe, combines catchy melodies with sparking semiquaver passage work. During a central episode, subtle polyrhythmic clashes are created as the oboe plays a florid cantilena while the strings maintain the movements 6/8 rhythm.
